Clinical significance of serum fetuin-A and osteoprotegerin in patients with systemic lupus erythematosus. Fetuin-A (FetA), an inhibitor of calcium and phosphate, is secreted by bone, liver, and kidney into the plasma, and has been found to be increased in inflammatory diseases.

Osteoprotegerin (OPG) is a newly discovered member of the tumor necrosis factor receptor superfamily, which seems to be involved in osteoclast differentiation and bone resorption. Although the pathogenic role of OPG in systemic lupus erythematosus (SLE) has been recently proposed, the involvement of FetA has not been clarified. This study evaluated clinical significance of serum FetA and OPG in SLE. Serum concentration of FetA and OPG was determined by an enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay, and clinical features of SLE were retrospectively evaluated. Serum concentration of FetA was not different between SLE patients (n=105) and healthy controls (n=29), while the serum concentration of OPG in SLE patients was significantly higher than that in healthy controls. FetA and OPG levels were correlated with SLEDAI ($r=0.337$, p
