Q: BufferedInputStream.available never returns 1 if the stream is closed I implemented a function that checks if a file has been replaced on the base path (file.getCanonicalPath()) and I'm trying to detect if the size of the file is smaller than the previous one. In this case I should replace the file and keep the previous one. The problem is when the stream is closed the call to.available() is never returning 1. This is the code: 1) I have a class that wraps my stream to clear any problems with the stream: public class BaseStream implements Closeable { private final InputStream stream; public BaseStream(InputStream is) { stream = is; } @Override public void close() throws IOException { if (stream != null) stream.close(); } public int available() throws IOException { return stream.available(); } 2) The function that reads the file and updates the size: private Integer updateSize(InputStream inputStream) { InputStream stream = null; int length = 0; try { stream = new BufferedInputStream(inputStream); byte [] buff = new byte[16384]; while (true) { int read = stream.read(buff); if (read == -1) break; if (read == 1) System.out.println("1 element"); length += read;

Solving Common Java Array Assertions I've written many blog posts on creating custom methods on the object to test out different Data Pipeline functions that might not be covered by the standard tests. Some of these functions mimic the data pipeline such as converting between one type of data structure to another. Below is an example of a custom method on the Object that is a good way to solve array assertions. The format below only works for array types, so it will be ignored for non-array types. You can add your own custom methods to detect array types in your objects and pass them to the pipeline. It is possible in these cases to return an instance of the same type as the original object being processed. This will result in tests failing with the original object being unaffected as it continues down the data pipeline. Another option would be to wrap the original object's contents into an array. This will preserve the original object type as well as its contents and will prevent any tests on the original object from failing, but it will also lock the original object's contents into the array. For example, in the following code snippet, the array type of `getVector()` returns null as expected. However, the value at index 8 is checked against `VectorTest`'s expected value before moving along. The type is preserved because the array is created, but the contents of the array will be locked in. It is possible to write a custom method that will print out messages if the assertion fails, but this would be error prone because it would require referencing another object. It is also possible to use the `@Validate` annotation, as shown below. This will check each assertion on the line of code, and you can add all the assertions to a single array. However, the `@Validate` annotation will not consider all methods in the Object class as valid tests for array types, so this approach will not work across all situations. To compare the two example, the custom method returns an instance of the original object type because it is passed into the object as a parameter. In the custom method version, an array is created for the objects contents, but the original object is not affected by the assertions. In the @Validate version, Windows 8, Windows 7, Windows Vista and Windows XP users can use our emulator. You also need to use a separate graphics card with 3D hardware acceleration like NVIDIA Geforce or AMD/ATI.
